We evaluated the mental disorders of the patients attended in an emergency room of a public general hospital in Mexico City in the period from January 2001 to April 2002. We found that 65% were women; 63% came for visits due to "common" problems; 81% had a confirmed diagnosis of some type of psychiatric illness, and 36% of the cases needed treatment. The main diagnosis was depressive disorder, which was more common in women and among the elderly. Patients suffering from affective disorders frequently received psychopharmacological treatment, while those with anxiety disorders received psychotherapeutic treatment. We conclude that, although a little more work needs to be done, emergency departments can also be important mental health centres. Continuity of care from breast cancer and COPD: health care utilization and cost for women with breast cancer. COPD often goes undetected in patients with breast cancer and affects their overall health and disease outcomes. In addition, comorbid COPD is an independent risk factor for poorer outcomes of treatment of both diseases. The purpose of this study was to examine continuity of care from breast cancer and COPD in the year after initial diagnosis using a nationally-representative sample of Medicare beneficiaries with Medicare fee-for-service claims. Continuity of care was examined among 59,372 women with breast cancer (n = 57,647) and COPD (n = 5035) in the year following diagnosis. Rates of having an office visit or being hospitalized for COPD were considerably higher in breast cancer patients compared with COPD patients. Breast cancer patients with COPD were less likely to have continuity of care in the year following diagnosis compared with those without COPD. Among the breast cancer patients with COPD, presence of COPD was associated with lower odds of having an office visit for COPD (relative odds [RO] 0.69, 95% confidence interval [CI] 0.63-0.75) or being hospitalized for COPD (RO 0.62, 95% CI 0.52-0.76). Among patients without COPD, several of the differences in cost between those with and without COPD were either reduced or disappeared after adjustment for disease severity. In conclusion, patients with both breast cancer and COPD were less likely to have continuity of care in the year following diagnosis. Among patients with COPD, the presence of COPD was associated with reduced odds of having an office visit for COPD and of being hospitalized for COPD in the year after diagnosis.Q: How do I make a binding to a observable collection of objects in Silverlight?
