Another way is using BigDecimal class: double num = 2453.16; BigDecimal newNum = new BigDecimal(num).stripTrailingZeros(); double newNum = newNum.doubleValue(); Hope that helps! Q: IOS application: optimize performance (hardware)? Sorry if the question is not specific enough, I am new to the world of IOS development. I have an IOS application (I'm using C++/Cocoa) that will need to have a high number of updates (every second) and I wonder if there is a way to speed up execution. I'm not talking about user-interface (I'm using custom controls and so on, nothing fancy). I'm talking about application-level operations, for example: Updating a map marker Adding/removing objects from the map view Saving (or not) local changes on the cloud All of this operation will run on a background thread (not UI thread). I wonder if there is any way to do this without slowing the application down too much. Any ideas? Thanks, A: For the first question: You might be able to b7e8fd5c8
